Europe’s fantasy about war with Russia

Russia won’t attack unless provoked. The real danger? European politicians entangling their people in a nuclear-risky proxy war they never asked for.

> For citizens of Western European countries in particular, it is almost a daily occurrence: the war rhetoric peddled by politicians and the media on social platforms or news websites. Every day, politicians speak of their support for Ukraine, through thick and thin – for the so-called security of Europe, of course – because that is how they try to convince their local audiences that Russia is definitely going to attack. Various target dates have already been floated, especially by Germany and the Netherlands: first it was 2026, then 2027, and ultimately it will probably be 2030.

Coincidentally, this date aligns with the United Nations’ Agenda 2030. That agenda tells citizens that around 2030 everything will be “rosy”: no hunger, no poverty, and no war. Of course, until that date, countries are permitted to slaughter civilians in terrorism and wars, and many citizens have died or will die of hunger, conflict, or those nasty “injections” based on mRNA. But hey – anything for Agenda 2030 and the fantasy of a few Western countries spreading their agenda and democracy across the globe. This is, of course, meant ironically; Western countries have been spreading war, domination, and colonialism for centuries.

NATO has for some time been reinforcing the borders between Eastern European countries, the Baltic states, Poland, Finland, and Russia to ward off a so-called “threat.” That threat is, of course, Russia. They are driving their citizens to madness with propaganda – particularly, and I am personally referring to Dutch and German politics – with empty slogans such as: “If we don’t do it, we will have to learn Russian, or you will experience a war worse than that of your parents and grandparents” (NATO Secretary-General Mark Rutte). This dangerous madness is irrational, because a direct confrontation with Moscow will never take place if it is up to Moscow. Russia has repeatedly stated that it never intends to attack; unless, of course, it is attacked, it will then defend itself – but that is normal!

The sad thing about this story is that these political elites are trying to “infect” their citizens with Russophobia and fear. The same scenario was used – albeit now to a much greater extent against Russia – when the West started the wars against Afghanistan, Iraq, Libya, and Syria. Russia was and remains high on the wish list of the political elite, first in the U.S. under Obama and Biden, and now to a large extent also among European politicians and elites who embraced the Ukrainian proxy-war scenario. Meanwhile, the U.S. is extending its colonial expansionist course to Iran and Israel – and fully supporting Zionism – resulting in many deaths, injuries, and the destruction of villages and cities in Gaza, the Palestinian West Bank, and Lebanon.

Furthermore, the Baltic states – Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia – are actively building their defense lines, digging anti-tank trenches, and laying minefields. After all, they know that Russia will not simply invade their country; that is pure fantasy. Finland and Poland are likewise obsessed with the urge to build new walls. We already have a new digital wall between East and West, and now, since 2023, they have been building a physical wall as well. The new Cold War has been a reality since 2023. This time, it is Europe that is betting on war and building walls.

These actions can be called downright ridiculous; soon the number of NATO soldiers will exceed the population of, for instance, the Baltic states – and for what? For Russia, which is not going to attack! Poland shares a border with Russia via the city of Kaliningrad and has even given the city a new (old) name; that is how far the madness of these countries goes. May 10, 2023, the Polish government announced that the name “Kaliningrad” will no longer be used in official Polish inscriptions and documents. This Russian city, barely 50 kilometers from the Polish border, will henceforth be referred to in Poland by its old Polish name, Królewiec. Barely five days after the Polish decision, the official Language Center in neighboring Latvia recommended replacing the name Kaliningrad in Latvian with Karaļauči (the traditional Baltic name) or Kēnigsberga (derived from the German name). In Lithuania, where the traditional name Karaliaučius had already been officially recognized since 1997, a discussion arose to scrap the name Kaliningrad entirely.

Is all this a conspiracy theory? No, in my opinion, a major reason is the poor economy in Europe and the plan behind it – the scenario that was already fixed. Why do I say that? Particularly in Western European countries, and I am referring specifically to the Netherlands, citizens heard day in and day out during the so-called corona crisis, via the weekly press conferences of – there he is again – former Prime Minister Mark Rutte, that “we will never return to normal.” And indeed, immediately after the corona crisis, Europe’s declaration of war followed in 2022 (and at the time, by the U.S. as well).

I remember it well: when I arrived in Moscow in March 2022, a week after the start of the special military operation, sanctions were immediately imposed by the (Western) banks; it was no longer possible to withdraw money from ATMs with an EU card. McDonald’s and other Western retail chains were closed. No country can organize such a closure in less than a week; the plan was simply already in place – that is just how it works. They had merely waited for the right moment and provoked Moscow to the extreme with their actions and smear campaigns since 2014, forcing President Putin and his government to take action against Western Europe and the U.S. in particular; otherwise, there would now be NATO troops on the border with Russia or in Moscow.

But taking all this madness with a grain of salt, the risk is very high for the Baltic states to be cut off from the rest of NATO. This is due to the Suwałki Corridor, a strip of land of approximately 100 kilometers along the Polish-Lithuanian border, which connects Belarus with Russia’s city of Kaliningrad. That is how far madness goes in Europe, and as I have written many times, the Baltic states are fascist states. The Holocaust essentially began in Lithuania and other Eastern European countries, as I have shared many times, and particularly in Lithuania, virtually the entire population participated in it. Talking about it is still taboo there! Ukraine is also still a fascist country, as we can see daily on social media and news outlets.

Why are the Netherlands, and especially Germany, going along with this madness, knowing that what is happening is pure fascism? The State of Israel has already filed many complaints against the regime in Ukraine, such as recently when Zelensky (himself a Jew but a fascist) overturned the reburial of former OUN leader Andrey (Andriy) Melik. He was reburied on May 25, 2026, at the National Military Memorial Cemetery (NVMC) near Kiev. Melik was a fascist. He collaborated with the German intelligence service (Gestapo) and fought against the Poles, and he hated the Jews. He regarded the Russians – the Red Army – as Bolsheviks consisting of Jews who had to die; that was the view at the time, and apparently Zelensky and the Ukrainians have deliberately forgotten this. Zelensky's grandfather – his paternal grandfather, Semyon Zelensky, was an infantryman and colonel in the Soviet Red Army during World War II. He fought on the front lines, survived the war with multiple medals, and was the only survivor among his three brothers, who were murdered along with their parents in the Holocaust. And he is giving this former Nazi fascist a reburial – or he is under so much pressure from his handlers in the West, he "snorts" too much stuff, or he is just plain stupid!

This madness, particularly in the Western European countries, the Baltic states, Poland, and Finland, has been going on for more than four years and there is no end in sight: no diplomacy, no peace talks, only war rhetoric and absolutely nothing else. But they are becoming increasingly entangled in their own web of lies and deceit, their propaganda, which the citizens largely see through. They are not going to attack Russia; if they were to do so, they know it could likely lead to a nuclear catastrophe. Although Russian Foreign Minister Lavrov has stated that Russia will not start a war with Europe, as President Putin has also frequently emphasized, they are not listening. But with such infected people, of course, we cannot rule anything out. They are crazy – does that sound harsh? Yes, but you see, read, or hear that madness every day. They are in the grip of the fascist madness virus, and no cure has been found yet. Because the citizens are not rising up as yet, they are walking straight into the trap set for them by their insane politicians – and according to these politicians, they must wage war, but they will be crushed by Russia if they do once again. The citizens of Western Europe are probably smarter than the politicians who govern them, and whom, in many cases, they did not even choose to rule them and want to lure them into a war which they, the citizens, oppose!
